Abstract	George Trescher served as Secretary of The Metropolitan Museum of Art's 100th Anniversary Committee of the Board of Trustees. In this capacity he coordinated planning and implementation of the eighteen month Centennial celebration that included a wide variety of Museum programs and activities. The records contain information on Centennial exhibitions at the Metropolitan Museum as well as exhibitions that traveled to other institutions. They also contain information on film and television projects, publications and clippings, and documentation of tours of the Museum for members of other museums and cultural organizations across the United States. Also included are the scores of original Centennial fanfares commissioned to accompany exhibitions, and photographic documentation of events. The records of contributions from Centennial sponsors and other donors are evidence of the concerted fundraising activities associated with the event.

Biographical note

George Trescher (1926-2003) was named Secretary of The Metropolitan Museum of Art's 100th Anniversary Committee of the Board of Trustees on September 1, 1966. He coordinated planning and implementation of the eighteen month centennial celebration, which included a wide variety of programs and activities. After graduating from the University of California, Berkeley in 1947, Trescher worked in promotion and publicity for magazines. He joined the staff of Sports Illustrated in 1954, and served as its promotion director from 1960 to 1966. In September 1970, after the conclusion of the Metropolitan's Centennial celebrations, Trescher was named Vice-Director for Public Affairs. In this newly created position at the Museum, he supervised administrative functions including public relations, publicity, programming in the Grace Rainey Rogers auditorium, retail operations, and fundraising. He left the Museum in 1971 and founded George Trescher Associates in 1972, specializing in fundraising for organizations and planning benefit events. His clients included nonprofit organizations such as the Municipal Arts Association, the Julliard School, the Shakespeare Guild, the New York City Opera, and Vassar College, as well as corporations including the New York Stock Exchange and The New York Times. He also consulted with individuals on charitable giving, including among his clients Jacqueline Kennedy Onassis and Brooke Astor.

Historical note

The Metropolitan Museum of Art celebrated its centennial with exhibitions, symposia, concerts, lectures, the reopening of refurbished galleries, special tours, social events, and other programming for eighteen months from October 1969 through the spring of 1971. The highlight was an open house and Centennial Ball on April 13, 1970. The anniversary was organized by The Metropolitan Museum of Art's 100th Anniversary Committee, chaired by Trustee Roswell L. Gilpatric and including Museum President Arthur A. Houghton, Trustees Brooke Astor, C. Douglas Dillon, and Arthur K. Watson, advertising executive David Ogilvy, CBS President Frank Stanton, socialite and representative to the United Nations Commission on Human Rights Marietta Tree, and collector and future Museum Trustee Jayne Wrightsman. Events were held both at the Museum and beyond, reaching cities throughout the United States and overseas.

Centennial special events at the Museum centered around five exhibitions celebrating the breadth of the Museum's collecting over the previous one hundred years: "New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940-1970," "The Year 1200," "19th-Century America," "Before Cortés: Sculpture of Middle America," and "Masterpieces of Seven Centuries."

"New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940-1970" was the Museum's first exhibition of contemporary American art, curated by Henry Geldzahler to mark the inauguration of the newly established department of Contemporary Arts. It elicited reactions ranging from shock to relief at the new direction of collecting that it signaled. For each exhibition, a contemporary American composer was commissioned to create an orchestral fanfare. Seven smaller exhibitions also opened, accompanied by related curatorial, educational, and social activities.

April 13, 1970 marked the 100th anniversary of the granting of the Metropolitan Museum's charter by the State of New York. On April 10 the Museum hosted a reception for staff members, before which Director Thomas Hoving presented the Museum's "Comprehensive Plan for the Second Century," which would guide building and program efforts in the coming decades. On April 13, the Museum held an open house for New York residents from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., including a receiving line of political dignitaries, special programs, refreshments, and entertainment in the Museum and on its Fifth Avenue plaza. The Centennial Ball that evening was hosted by Trustee Brooke Astor and featured reduced ticket prices for staff members and their families. Four ballrooms were set up in the Museum, each decorated by a noted New York interior decorator around the theme of a specific historical event or artistic period. An enormous cake was presented during the evening and served in the galleries, along with soft drinks and coffee.

Other initiatives included educational programs, book publishing, television programs, film projects, and receptions to coincide with meetings of professional organizations including the American Association of Museums.

In celebration of the Centennial the Museum published eighteen new books, twelve directly related to the anniversary and six to other aspects of its collections. Among them were Merchants and Masterpieces: The Story of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, written by New Yorker staff writer Calvin Tomkins and published in 1970, which serves as an official history of the institution, and a centennial issue of the Metropolitan Museum Journal published to coincide with the celebrations' conclusion in 1971.

Specially tailored Museum visits were organized for members of other museums and cultural organizations across the United States to see the Centennial exhibits and participate in related programming. An intensive advertising, promotion, and public relations campaign publicized the events to a wide range of visitors and distant supporters through newspapers, magazines, and other print publications, as well as television and local store window displays. Artist Frank Stella was commissioned to create a Centennial logo, and medals incorporating the design were struck to mark the occasion. Remodeled and refurbished galleries in the Museum opened during this period, including the Ancient Near Eastern Art and Egyptian Art departments and the Costume Institute in the fall of 1970, and a reinstallation of the Musical Instruments collections. The extent of air-conditioned gallery space was doubled, to include almost two-thirds of the Museum's exhibition spaces.

Considerable emphasis was also put on fundraising for the expenses associated with the Centennial celebrations. Donations and specially designated Centennial sponsorship and

Centennial membership levels of support were solicited from individuals, businesses, and nonprofit organizations.

Scope and Contents note

The George Trescher records related to The Metropolitan Museum of Art Centennial contain material about the eighteen-month celebration of the Museum's first one hundred years, which drew attention to the steady growth of the Museum in its first century. It also marked the beginning of new areas of collecting at the Museum such as modern art, and methods of outreach to people of all ages, races, and walks of life. The records contain information on Centennial exhibitions at the Metropolitan Museum and other institutions, film and television projects, publications and clippings, and documentation of tours of the Museum for members of other museums and cultural organizations across the United States. They also include the scores of original centennial fanfares commissioned to accompany exhibitions, as well as photographic documentation of events. The records of contributions from Centennial sponsors and other donors provide evidence of the concerted fundraising activities associated with the event, which would lead soon after to the establishment of the Museum's first dedicated Development department.

The records also provide a detailed snapshot of New York City cultural life at a moment of artistic upheaval and social change. By the late 1960s, the rise of youth culture, increased demands for racial and gender equity, and the questioning of establishment culture in public discourse and through the media was effecting change at institutions including the Metropolitan Museum. These trends are documented in the records by material on the Museum's new use of film, television, educational outreach, and theater to reach a wider and more diverse audience than previously in its history, as well as public responses to new areas of programming and other initiatives.

Although arranged into eight separate series based on Trescher's original organization, the records overlap in many areas. Researchers interested in specific exhibitions are advised to consult both Series I. Administrative and Series II. Exhibitions for the widest range of information on these topics. Likewise, some information in Series VIII. Metropolitan Museum of Art General Files overlaps with, complements, or expands on that organized by Trescher's office into Series I. Administration.

Arrangement note

The records are arranged in eight series: I. Administration, II. Exhibitions, III. Film and Television Projects, IV. Publications, V. Centennial Tours, VI. Centennial Sponsors, VII. Background and Research Files, and VIII. Metropolitan Museum of Art General Files

Series II. Exhibitions 1963-1971 (bulk 1968-1970)Historical note

Five major exhibitions formed the centerpiece of the Centennial celebrations at the Museum, both highlighting the breadth of its collecting over the previous one hundred years and signaling its look forward to the next century: "New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940-1970," "The Year 1200," "19th-Century America," "Before Cortés: Sculpture of Middle America," and "Masterpieces of Seven Centuries." "New York Painting and Sculpture: 1940-1970" was the Museum's first exhibition of contemporary American art, curated by Henry Geldzahler to mark the inauguration of the newly established department of Contemporary Arts. It elicited reactions ranging from shock to relief at the new direction of collecting it represented. For each exhibition, a contemporary American composer was commissioned to create an orchestral fanfare. Seven smaller exhibitions also opened, each accompanied by related curatorial, educational, and social activities.

As part of the Museum's expanded outreach programs, the Centennial was marked with loan exhibitions to museums in the United States and overseas, including Expo '70 in Osaka, Japan. "Treasures from the Cloisters and the Metropolitan Museum of Art" traveled to the Los Angeles County Museum of Art and the Art Institute of Chicago. "Prints by Nine New York Painters" was seen in Jerusalem and seven other cities, while "Masterpieces of Painting in the Metropolitan Museum of Art" traveled to The Museum of Fine Arts, Boston, which celebrated its own centennial in 1970.

Many objects shown in "Before Cortés: Sculpture of Middle America" originated from the Mexican Instituto Nacional de Antropología y Historia as part of a twenty-five year reciprocal loan and cultural program with the Metropolitan Museum.

Scope and Contents note

The series includes administrative records from exhibitions held in celebration of the Centennial at the Museum, at other museums in the United States and Japan, as well as planned exhibitions that were not realized. It also includes background information and research materials on both the exhibitions themselves and related programming, such as a medieval joust re-enactment held in conjunction with "The Year 1200."

The series also includes records related to the exhibition "Harlem on My Mind: Cultural Capital of Black America 1960-1968," which was on view at the Museum from January to April, 1969, during the planning for the upcoming Centennial. An exploration of African-American life in the previous tumultuous decade, the exhibition provoked public discussion, both during its planning stages and while on view, at a level unprecedented in the Museum's history. Furor over perceived anti-Semitic remarks in the exhibition's catalog led to withdrawal of the publication and a public apology issued by Director Thomas Hoving.

"The Great Age of Fresco: Giotto to Pontormo," which was on view for only two months in the fall of 1968, was the first exhibition at the Museum to have corporate sponsorship. Olivetti's underwriting of the exhibition, documented in administrative files as well as a lavish commemorative scrapbook, was seen as a model for the pursuit of corporate sponsors for the Centennial exhibitions being planned at that time.

Series III. Film and Television Projects 1949, 1967-1970 (bulk 1968-1970)Historical note

"Cinémathèque at the Metropolitan Museum," which was jointly sponsored by the Museum and City Center of Music and Drama, showed seventy films dating from the medium's first seventy-five years on thirty-five consecutive evenings from July 29 to September 3, 1970. Individual films were grouped into eleven series, and each film was shown once, with two different screenings each evening. The films were selected by Cinémathèque Française founder and director Henri Langlois, from its archive of more than 50,000 films. Chosen for their significance and contributions to the history of filmmaking, they included work from official film industries as well as current and early avant garde directors. The program was the most diverse film exhibition held in the United States to date, and was the Museum's first major undertaking in film.

Other film projects included Francis Thompson's treatment of "19th Century America," and CBS TV films on that exhibition as well as "Before Cortés: Sculpture of Middle America." Television projects included "Masterpieces of Fifty Centuries" narrated by noted art historian Sir Kenneth Clark, a one-hour NBC program prepared by Aline Saarinen, and a network television report each evening during the week of October 6, 1969 on one of the five centerpiece Centennial exhibitions.

Scope and Contents note

The records include correspondence, planning documents, box office information, posters, and programs from film screenings held at the Museum as well as information on film and television projects undertaken in celebration of the Centennial. Some materials in this series originated in the office of Lucy Geringer, Consultant for Television and Film at the Museum, and from the files of other Centennial Committee staff members.

Series IV. Publications

The series documents specific books and other publishing projects undertaken in association with the Centennial as well as magazine and newspaper coverage of Centennial activities and the Museum in general during this period. The "Centennial history" refers to planning for what would be published as Merchants and Masterpieces: The Story of the Metropolitan Museum of Art, by New Yorker staff writer Calvin Tomkins, which serves as an official history of the institution.

Series V. Centennial Tours 1964-1971 (bulk 1968-1969)Historical note

As early as 1966, Museum Trustee and Centennial Committee member Brooke Astor had suggested finding a way for art-minded residents of other cities to visit the Museum during the Centennial to view exhibitions, participate in related activities, and potentially join the Museum as members and/or donors. From October 1969 through January 1971 the Museum organized fifteen three-day tours and fourteen one-day tours of the Museum for groups of members from museums and cultural organizations across the United States. Close to one thousand guests from thirty museums and thirty-five cities participated. While in New York, tour participants met Museum staff members and Trustees, took guided tours of Centennial exhibitions, visited local public institutions and private collections, attended Broadway plays, and were entertained at large and small social gatherings both at the Museum and in private homes.

To promote the tours, tour coordinator Dorothy Bauman visited sixty museums in the southern, midwestern, and far western United States, and in Canada. Director Thomas Hoving hosted a breakfast at the annual American Association of Museums meeting to address staff from those institutions whom Bauman was unable to visit. Trescher and Bauman amassed information on museums and collections in a wide variety of American cities, and organized the details of the individual tours' programming and associated social events.

Scope and Contents note

The records include planning for visits to museums and professional meetings by Metropolitan Museum staff to publicize the Centennial tour program, tour planning documents, information on institutions participating in tours, and correspondence with individual participants including extensive files of thank you notes.

Some materials in this series originated in the office of Dorothy Bauman.

Arrangement note

The series is arranged in two subseries: V.A. Participant Institution Brochures, and V.B. Planning and Correspondence.

Series VI. Centennial Sponsors 1968-1972Historical note

As well as organizing events and programs, the Centennial Committee was charged with fundraising both for the significant expenses of the Centennial celebration and as the first step in the Museum's master plan of expansion and renovation in the 1970s. Individuals, businesses, and nonprofit organizations termed Centennial Sponsors were identified and solicited for donations of $1,000 and higher. Benefits of a new Centennial membership level of $100 included invitations to private exhibition viewings and first editions of Centennial publications. The Museum raised approximately $4 million for the Centennial, which included a dozen private donors who together gave $1.6 million and one thousand Centennial sponsors who gave $1 million. An estimated forty percent of those donating in this period were first-time contributors to the Museum.

Series VII. Background and Research Files 1960-1971 (bulk 1966-1970)

Scope and Contents note

Subseries VII.A. New York City

The series documents the extensive research activity that preceded the Museum's organization of its centennial events and programs. It includes research materials used for event and publicity planning, and, in Subseries VII.B., correspondence with and background information on other cultural organizations and the details of their anniversary celebrations.

Arrangement note

The series is arranged in six subseries: VII. A. New York City, VII.B. Museums and Other Cultural Organizations, VII.C. Orientation, VII.D. Photography, VII. E. Press and Clippings, and VII.F. Television

Each subseries is arranged alphabetically by subject.

Series VIII. Metropolitan Museum of Art General Files 1964-1970 (bulk 1967-1970)Scope and Contents note

The series includes correspondence, planning material, and other documentation on Centennial events and activities predominantly created by, sent to, or received from Museum departments, committees, and staff members. It also documents some non-Centennial activities during the period 1968-1970. These include information collected in preparation for and response to hearings held by the New York City Council in September 1970 on the Museum's master plan for additional gallery space to accommodate the recently acquired Temple of Dendur and Robert Lehman Collection and other gallery expansion. Some information overlaps with, complements, or expands on that organized by Trescher's office into Series I. Administration.
